

Society

The lengthening of the social season, by advancing its opening date rather than overlapping its closing functions into the supposedly quiet days of Lent, is again fully illustrated by the plans now completed or in progress for November.

The opening of Congress will find society in full working order, not only for the large array of debutantes who are always the star performers of the first act of the season's play, but for a large portion of other people who come to Washington to enjoy the social life of the Capital, whether in an official position or merely a part of the growing colony of persons of taste and means from everywhere, who find here the ideal American community, with representatives from every part of our own great country, not to mention the nearly two-score foreign nations now maintaining social, as well as official, relations with Washington.

The President and Mrs. Roosevelt, to whose example this early season owes its birth, have, as in former years, been extending an informal hospitality, as far as any hospitality in the Executive Mansion can be informal, to their friends and the members of the Administration circle, in the way of small dinner parties of from four to six guests, on an average of twice a week.

Mrs. Roosevelt, also, last Tuesday inaugurated her morning-at-home for the ladies of the Cabinet, when they met at the White House for an hour or two of informal discussion of any social question of interest, and to enjoy the society of their hostess and each other.

The return of Mrs. Taft from Cuba will bring the number of Cabinet hostesses up to five, the absentees being Mrs. Shaw, Mrs. Bonaparte, and Mrs. Wilson.

The Secretary of the Treasury and Mrs. Shaw, on their return to town, will take an apartment at the Arlington for the remainder of their residence in Washington, while the Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Bonaparte will, as last winter, keep an apartment at the Portland, even though Mrs. Bonaparte continues to reside in her Baltimore home, joining her husband at frequent intervals for the numerous official duties demanding her presence here.

Miss Wilson, daughter of the Secretary of Agriculture, whose position as a Cabinet hostess and one of her country's representatives, her father having held his present portfolio from the opening days of the first McKinley Administration, will continue her residence in Paris another year.

The diplomatic season will not open until January 1, although there will be an exchange of many courtesies among the diplomats and their personal friends before that time, as nearly all envoys will return to Washington early in December, and a considerable number even before that date. A conspicuous change in the corps will be the elevation of the Ambassador from Austria-Hungary to the position of dean, to succeed Baron Mayor des Planches of Italy, whose resignation from the service leaves his embassy with charge d'affaires as his chief, and gives the representative of Emperor Francis Joseph the first place at all diplomatic functions, as well as the ruling voice in all matters of diplomatic policy and etiquette.

In this important role M. von Hengelmüller will be a worthy successor of the late Lord Plamondon, of England, the first Ambassador ever accredited to Washington, and his successor to the first place on the diplomatic ladder, Count Cassini, of Russia.

Nine of the thirty-seven foreign powers maintaining diplomatic relations with the United States are represented by Ambassadors, with the possibility of China and Turkey elevating their envoys to a similar grade in the near future.

The Austrian Ambassador and Baroness Hengelmüller, with several members of the embassy staff, will pass the next few weeks at Lenox, where they have quarters at the Curtis.

The embassy offices have, however, been transferred to this city from Lenox, where they were located for the summer.

A much-discussed topic in clubs and drawing rooms in the next few weeks will be whether to continue the once popular and important Bachelors' Cotillions through another season, or to abandon at least temporarily, these three balls, which for a quarter of a century have been the most important dancing events of the Washington season. Although a number of the Bachelors' governors are still absent from town, and no decisive action likely to be taken until November, there is every reason to fear that this most essentially Washington company of hosts will disband and the Bachelors go the way of the Washington Assembly, the Alibi Club and other time-honored social institutions.

The marriage during the past summer of Maj. Charles McCawley, U. S. M. C., president of the club, and Mrs. McCawley's reported intention of withdrawing from general society, will remove from the Bachelors not only its president, but its prime worker in the organization and management of the dances. Maj. McCawley possessed not only every qualification for social leadership, but also sufficient leisure to carry his plans to completion, a rare combination not exactly within reach of other officers of the club willing to assume the responsibility worn so easily by Maj. McCawley. The latter is still on sick leave and will not return to town until November, even should he be fortunate enough to continue on duty in Washington, which is the present day of many changes and hasty orders in both army and navy, makes an officer's life quite the reverse of monotonous.

The Benedict Dances, organized last winter by many of the former Bachelors, and composed largely of the young rich and smart married set, will, it is said, increase its membership in the coming season and give three dances, instead of two, as last year.

The Duke, who, in addition to being one of the grandees of Spain, possesses the English title of Duke of Berwick, inherited from his English ancestors of the time of James II. He is rich, under thirty years of age, and allied to many of the leading families of three great nations. NEW RHYTHMETRIC MESSAGE.

A wonderfully effective method for Preserving Woman's Youthfulness.

It is but natural that woman, to whom beauty is such a valuable asset, should feel a keen interest in any new method of beauty which will preserve and intensify her womanly charms.

The great success of the Hattie M. Shacklette treatment of the hair has gained for it a small measure to the progressive methods employed therein.

Miss Shacklette's latest acquisition is the "rhythmic massage." This treatment, which advances thoroughly original ideas on the art of beautifying, will be a feature of the new Shacklette toilet studio during the fall and winter.

It derives its name from the rhythmic character of the treatment, the treatment is administered. It is employed for both face and scalp with most gratifying results. It is a treatment so common in this strenuous age, removing lines, correcting sagging muscles, etc.

ORIGIN OF THE STAMP.

New Story About the Birth of Rowland Hill's Idea.

From the Chicago Chronicle.
The Chicago postal officials are discussing a story from Washington which has been printed in the Postal Clerk, a local organ of the post-office employees, concerning the origin of the postage stamp. A number of explanations have been made concerning its origin, but many are ready to accept the latest story as being authentic. The story gives Rowland Hill the credit for the postage system of charging for postage originated sixty-five years ago.

Mr. Hill was traveling in England, when he saw a young woman receive a letter from a postman. She looked at it carefully and then asked the amount of postage. When told a shilling she said that she could not afford it, although the letter was from her brother. Mr. Hill paid the postage. She told him that she and her brother had devised a system of shorthand which they wrote on the outside of a sealed envelope and sent through the mails. When the letters were delivered each protested lack of funds, returning the letter after reading the notations on the envelopes. Mr. Hill's scheme was to compel the payment of postage before sending the letter.

Yale's President Missed His Bath.

From Life.
President Arthur Hadley, of Yale, has a couple of sons who inherit a good deal of the genius and independent thought of their father. One morning Mrs. Hadley got up and went into the bathroom and found her youngest, aged about five, busy turning the swans and fish in the bathtub, guiding them with a magnet. She gathered up the toys and told the youngster that he must defer his amusement, as his papa wanted to take his bath. The child returned the letter with bad grace, but went out in the street. Presently he met a lady, and it's going to stay there, see?
